-hood (hud), suffix [ME. -hod (-hode) —OE. hād = OS. -hēd, OHG. -heit.] Orig a distinct n., meaning 'person, personality, condition, quality, rank' (see Had sb), which being freely combined with nouns, as in OE. cild hād child-condition, mægð-hād virgin state, pāpan hād papal dignity, ceased at length to be used as a separate word, and survived as a mere suffix, and is thus noteworthy as a late example of the process by which suffixes arose The ME. form was regularly -hōd, with open ō, as still in Chaucer, but in the 15th c it had become close ō (rhyming in Hokenham's Sevntyn with gōd 'good'), and this duly gave mod. Eng hood.
A parallel suffix, from same root and in same sense, is -head, ME. hed, -hede, -es heid
A considerable number of derivatives in -hood go back to OE hād, e g bishophood, childhood, priesthood; many are of later origin, either with hood substituted for the cognate -hede, -head, e g falsehood, likelihood, or as analogical formations, in some of which hood has displaced earlier suffixes Being a living suffix, hood can be affixed at will to almost any word denoting a concrete thing, and to many adjectives to express condition or state, so that the number of these derivatives is indefinite None formations are numerous

2 The central solid part of a wheel from which the spokes radiate, and which rotates on (or with) the axle, the nave

Although used by Blithe in 1649, and (from him) by several 19th-c writers, and in Bradley's Farm Dict 1742–61 s.v. Wood, this word appears to have been merely dialectal, being unrecognized by the Dictionaries till the 19th c., when it appears first in the American Webster (1828) and Worcester (1846). It has received literary currency mainly from O W Holmes, and has recently become generally known in connexion with bicycles. Forby gives under Nab, nub (besides the entry cited below) the alleged meaning 'the hilt or guard of a weapon, with which he connects wip to the knob,' so far as possible, this phrase is in American use associated with the hub of a wheel, as implying 'deeply, to a great extent, inextricably involved'

a. As sb. or quasi sb., with plural

(a) In singular. Usually a (arch an) hundred, emphatically one hundred, in phrases expressing rate, the hundred

In (upon, † at, † for) the hundred (in reckoning interest, etc.), now usually expressed by 'per cent.'

The construction (when there is any) is in OE with gen. pl. later with of and a pl. noun; in ME this is limited to definite things (e.g. a hundred of the men, of those men, of them), except in the case of measures of quantity, e.g. a hundred of bricks, we do not now use this construction for a noun standing alone (e.g. a hundred of men), but substitute the construction with a plural verb: e.g. a hundred of my friends were chosen; a second hundred were then enrolled

b As adj. or quasi adj., followed immediately by a plural (or collective) noun

In OE sometimes used as true adjective, otherwise unavoidable (like other cardinal numbers above twenty), or declined in con cord with its sb. The use in later times may be regarded either as a continuation of this, or as an ellipsis of of before the following plural noun: its substantival character is seen by its to be always preceded by a or some adjective (numeral, demonstrative, possessive, relative or interrogative). Either the sing. or the plural is used in the sense of a body of men, a force, which has precisely parallel constructions

5 In England (and subseq. in Ireland). A sub division of a county or shire, having its own court, also formerly applied to the court itself cf. COUNTY 4. Chiltern Hundreds : see CHILTERN

Most of the English counties were divided into hundreds, but in some counties wapentakes, and in others wards, appear as divisions of a similar kind. The origin of the division into hundreds, which appears already in OE times, is exceedingly obscure, and very diverse opinions have been given as to its origin. It has been regarded as denoting simply a division of a hundred hides of land, as the district which furnished a hundred warriors to the host, as repre senting the original settlement of the hundred men, or as composed of a hundred hides, each of which furnished a single warrior (Stubbs Const. Hist. I. 453). It is certain that in some instances the hundred was discovered to contain exactly 100 hides of land (F. W. Maitland). The hundred, OHG (Alemannisch huntari, huntre, was a subdivision of the gau in Ancient Germany, but this connection between this and the English hundred is not clearly made out

Hurdy-gurdy (hɜ·dĭgɜ·dĭ) [app. a rhyming combination suggested by the sound of the instrument. Cf. Hurr-chirr, uproar, disorderly noise.]

1 A musical instrument of rustic origin resembling the lute or guitar, and having strings (two or more of which are tuned so as to produce a drone), which are sounded by the revolution of a rosined wheel turned by the left hand, the notes of the melody being obtained by the action of keys which 'stop' the strings and are played by the right hand, thus combining the characteristics of instruments of the bowed and the clavier kinds b In recent times, applied popularly to any instrument having a droning sound and played by turning a handle, as the barrel organ

The l is probably due to weakening of the stress on the second syllable. Cf mastrel from older mos prit. The change may conceivably have already taken place in Danish, as in OD gesta husthing.

The form hustings found in 16-17th c. may have been due to association with HOUSE, but there is no evidence that the word was taken to mean 'platform' before 1682. Blount (1656) who suggests a derivation from h. haulier (hawser) to raise does so on the ground that it is 'the principal and highest court in London'

2 A court held in the Guildhall of London by the Lord Mayor, Recorder, and Sheriffs (or Aldermen), long the supreme court of the city

The early history of this is in many points obscure. The mention of 'husting's weight' in the charter of Cnut (see 5) suggests that the husting had already then become a permanent institution for the transaction of city business.

The Hustings or Court of Hustings was formerly a court of common pleas of probate, of appeal against decisions of the sheriffs, a court of record for the enrolment of deeds of property, etc., but it is now convoked only for the purpose of considering and registering gifts made to the City. In the Calendar for 1898 'Hustings' is set down for 11 days during the year, although there has been only one meeting since 1888

Hydro- (həidro), before a vowel also hydr-, = Gr ὑδρ(ο-, combining form of ὕδωρ water, employed in many compounds adopted or formed from Greek

Of the numerous compounds in Greek some were adopted in Latin, whence they passed into English either directly or through French the earliest of these are hydropic, hydropsy, hydromancy, and hydromel, found in the 13th and 14th c A few others were added to the language during the 16th and 17th c as hydrocele, hydrographer, graphy, hydrology, hydrophobia, hydrostatic, but the greater number of the words now in use belong to the common scientific vocabulary of the 19th c (including the end of the 18th c)

The words so formed may be thus classed a Miscellaneous terms, in which hydro has the sense of 'water', as in hydrography, hydrometer, hydropathy, hydrostatics These pass into terms in which hydro is used in more or less loose combination, as hydrogeology, hydro-galvanic, hydro electricity, hydro extractor, hydro-propulsion

b In medical and pathological terminology, hydro is extensively used to form names of diseases (chiefly in Latin or Greek form), being prefixed (a) to names of parts of the body, to denote that such part is dropsical or affected with an accumulation of serous fluid, as in hydroabdomen (dropsy of the abdomen, ascites), hydroblepharon (um) [Gr βλέφαρον eyelid], hydrocardia [Gr καρδία heart], cranium, -derma, gaster [Gr γαστήρ belly], gastria, -hystera [Gr ὑστέρα womb], hydromphalum (us) [Gr ὀμφαλός navel], hydromyelus, myelia [Gr μυελός marrow used for 'spinal cord'], nephros [Gr νεφρός kidney], hydro-ovarium [see OVARY], pericardium, -peritonæum, hydrorhachis [Gr ῥάχις spine], hydrosalpinx [Gr σάλπιγξ trumpet, used for 'Fallopian tube'], hydrothorax, also, in the combination hydropneumo, to express the presence of water and air, as in hydropneumopericardium, hydropneumothorax, (b) to names of diseases or diseased formations, denoting the accompaniment of dropsy or of an accumulation of serous fluid, as hydrocachexia, -y [see CACHEXY], -diarrhœa, -hæmothorax, meningitis, -pericarditis, -peritonitis, hydrorrhachitis, etc, hydrocirsocele, hydr(o)enterocele, hydromeningocele, -myelocele, physocele, -sarcocele, hydroschiocele, etc

c Prefixed to names of minerals, hydro denotes a hydrous compound, or the addition of water or its constituents to the elements of the primary mineral

d In modern chemical terms (the earliest of which were formed in French), the prefix hydro- originally meant combination with water In many cases however this really amounted to combination with the hydrogen supplied by the water, so that hydro has become the regular combining form of hydrogen, like oxy- for oxygen, nitro- for nitrogen, cyano- for cyanogen

1822 IMISON Sc & Art II 21 To distinguish the acids formed by hydrogen, from those formed by oxygen, the former are designated by the word hydro, as the hydrochloric acid 1853 W GREGORY Inorg Chem (ed 3) 4 If composed of oxygen united to a metalloid, such as carbon, or a metal the acid is simply named from the metalloid or metal, as carbonic acid, chromic acid But if the acid contains hydrogen united to a metalloid, the word 'hydro' is prefixed, as hydro chloric acid (hydrogen and chlorine), hydro-sulphuric acid (hydrogen and sulphur), &c

Prefixed to the name of a compound substance, hydro- usually means the addition or substitution of hydrogen in its constitution, e g benzoin $C_{14}H_{12}O_2$, hydrobenzoin $C_{14}H_{14}O_2$, so cinchonine, hydrocinchonine, cellulose, hydrocellulose, etc

e In modern zoological terminology, hydro- is used in the nomenclature relating to members of the class HYDROZOA and their characteristic organs or parts Strictly speaking, hydro is here a combining form of the generic name HYDRA, but this is itself a derivative of Gr ὕδωρ, ὑδρ(ο- water, so that, as being ultimately from the same source, these terms may be classed with the other hydro-formations

f Derivatives of Gr ἱδρώς 'sweat' have been erroneously written hydro instead of hidro (the error being encouraged by the fact that sweat is a form of water), e g hydroadenitis inflammation of the sweat glands, hydrocritics, hydropyretic

The more important words in all these groups appear in their alphabetical order in the main series, others of less importance follow here
